

Has wheat any friends?

Put simply, there is not much that's bullish right now in the world of wheat. Stocks seem to keep growing, buyers seem happy to accept the cheapest price (no surprise here) and there is no shortage of sellers out there.

So it shouldn't come as too much of a surprise that wheat prices have been falling. In the past two weeks the international benchmark wheat price (Chicago wheat futures, May 10 delivery) fell nearly 9pct to current values under US$480/bu. The entire curve has shifted lower. Australian wheat prices were under pressure in the past few weeks also. ASX NSW wheat for January 11 delivery dropped A$12 to A$215/t while ASX WA Jan 11 wheat fell A$10 to A$213/t.

Prices can still fall further in the near term. A pullback in domestic US wheat consumption by the USDA this week added to an already bleak export demand profile, resulting in another upward revision to the US ending stock estimate for 2009/10. US wheat stocks are now forecast at over one billion bushels, up from just 306 million bushels in 2007/08. Compounding the issue was an upward revision to global supplies, driven by a bigger Argentinean crop and more wheat in the Russia. Bulky supplies in the US, Russia and Argentina is not good news for Australian producers, as all of these countries are exporters. News that India may begin to export wheat doesn't exactly paint a rosy picture either.

Can wheat markets lift? Of course, anything can happen. Firstly, it may be argued that the current wheat price should already reflect the negative news in the market. And weather related issues are always a possibility. It's too cold and wet in parts of Europe and the US, but right now no serious issues have emerged. There's also a chance lower plantings and production this year may support sentiment. This year the US has their smallest winter wheat area since 1913. Here in Australia we forecast wheat planting to decline by 5% in 2010. But other than that farmers might need to turn to their foes, the speculative investor, for support. The specs currently have a near record short position in the Chicago wheat complex. This means the market is susceptible to a short covering bounce. But the only problem is that without a change to the current fundamental picture, any potential short covering bounce is likely to be temporary.

We think it is likely, but there is no guarantee wheat prices will be higher in December than where they are now.
